

A quarter of workers in the capital say they haven't got a pension, new research reveals

- 25% workers in the capital said they didn't have a pension at all
- Only just over a quarter (26%) said they have a pension set up under new auto enrolment legislation, the lowest adoption rate of all the cities polled
- Only 51% said they had been offered a workplace pension, the lowest of all major cities polled
- Only just under a third (30 per cent) thought their savings would be sufficient to give them a comfortable retirement
- Only 9% said they could afford to pay more into their pension than they currently do, the lowest by a dramatic percentage of all the major cities polled
- More than one in five (26%) say they have/would opt out of a company pension scheme, the highest of all the major cities polled
- 59% said they would rather not think about their pension at the moment
- 46% say they were unaware Government and employer pay more into workplace pension than them
- 55% said they are unlikely to invest in a pension in the next five years

A quarter (25 per cent) of workers surveyed in London say they haven't got any sort of pension outside that offered by the state, authoritative new research has revealed.

Despite that, one in four (26 per cent) said they had opted out of a workplace pension scheme, or intended to.

Only just under a third (30 per cent) believe their pension pot will be sufficient to afford them a comfortable retirement. This new data also suggests that many are avoiding tackling the subject – with a whopping 59 per cent saying they would rather not think about their pension at the moment.

The survey, conducted by YouGov on behalf of workplace pension provider Smart Pension, found only nine per cent of workers polled in the city felt they could afford to save more towards their pension than they currently do - see all survey data at www.workplacepensions.com -

The poll, which questioned workers from 11 major cities and Smart Pension's 100,000 new auto enrolled members, found only half (51 per cent) of workers in the capital had been offered a workplace pension by their employer, the lowest of all the major cities polled. It also discovered only 26 per cent have a pension that has been set up under auto enrolment – the survey average is 40 per cent.

Since 2012 more than six million workers have been automatically enrolled into a workplace pension, which sees employers contribute a minimum of 1 per cent of employee salary, the Government at least 0.2 per cent – while employees only have to pay 0.8 per cent into their scheme currently.

The new pensions were introduced to plug a £28bn black hole in the pension budget.

As well as burying their head in the sand about the looming pension crisis, the survey also suggests a widespread lack of understanding across the whole country about the benefit of workplace schemes, and how they can help to build up a retirement nest-egg.

In London, 46 per cent said they were unaware auto enrolment meant their employer and the Government's combined contributions pay more into their pension than they do.

Will Wynne, co-founder and MD of Smart Pension, an online platform to help small businesses deal with the challenges of auto enrolment, says: "It seems everyone understands the need to save for their retirement, yet many are simply brushing the issue of pensions under the carpet.

"In a period when savings are being hammered by falling interest rates workplace pensions are an effective way of funding retirement.

"However, this research shows that too many British workers are either overlooking pensions entirely or not putting enough aside.

"There is a £28bn pensions black hole in the UK and workplace pensions are one of the ways people can save not only their own money, but also build up a pension pot much more quickly with contributions from the Government and their employer."

ENDS

For more details, please contact Liz Slee on 07540 060112 or email liz@lizziepin.com

Notes to editors:

All figures, unless otherwise stated, are from YouGov Plc. Total sample size was 1,652 adults, of 98 of whom were workers in London. Fieldwork was undertaken between 18th - 27th July 2016. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults (aged 18+) in each city.

ABOUT SMART PENSION:

Smart Pension is a MAF-accredited online auto enrolment provider. Its platform was built specifically to help thousands of small British businesses sign up their employees to a workplace pension scheme, as required by law. Smart Pension was co-founded in 2014 by Andrew Evans, CEO, and Will Wynne, Managing Director, and launched in May 2015. Its Master Trust is overseen by professional, independent trustees with decades of experience supervising large pension schemes. Smart Pension has partnered with Apex Fund Services, one of the world's largest independent funds administrators, to securely and cost-effectively administer employees' pensions. Smart Pension has a 5 star rating from Defaqto in the auto enrolment category. Smart Pension is the fastest auto enrolment platform on the market to sign up with and advisers and employers can use it for free - there are no upfront or ongoing charges for companies or their advisers. Smart Pension took over sponsorship of the GenLife Master Trust in September 2015.